That High Level Chitchat Sometimes Insignificant

In view of this similarity around their necks, Nehru, who was enjoying himself immensely, accused Dobrynin of collusion with the United States.

"What will Mao say?" he asked impishly.

DOBRYNIN THREW BACK his head and laughed out loud.

Rusk then told how the torturous wing collar came into being. He said when Edward VII did away with the ascot only a low round unbecoming collar was left. To make it look better, tailors then raised the collar, and then to make it more comfortable, they turned the corners down. "And we've been stuck with it for 50 years," said Rusk, who no longer will don one.

Rusk wound up his remarks at dinner that night toasting the Nehrus because they were celebrating that very day their 32nd wedding anniversary. Afterwards Nehru plied Rusk to find out how he knew it was their anniversary.

"Well, I asked the CIA to check all the capitals," began Rusk with a grin. Mrs. Nehru suddenly remembered that she had reminded her husband of the anniversary on the telephone the day before.

"Now I know. I always thought my phone was bugged!" exclaimed Nehru, and Rusk got so tickled his eyes squinted up with laughter to the point where he could no longer see eyeball to eyeball at all.

One of the Latin American ambassadors present spoke of Nicaraguan Ambassador Sevilla-Sacasa's speech to the OAS that day. Sevilla-Sacasa had taken a real ribbing from one of his colleagues because he kept minimizing the rebellion in his country and called it such a little thing that his colleague finally spoke up and said he must have been looking at it from the wrong end of his binoculars.
